branches to it at intervals, and carrying them inland to any townships that might spring up. But if this operation were repeated frequently, there would be as great a length of land line involved as would have been constructed a continuous trunk line, the only advantage being that the seaport towns would be accommodated.

A land line, precisely in the proportion in which it would be available as a local line, would benefit principally the colony through which it passes, and though this may form a strong recommendation to the colony concerned, it would not be so to those who merely wished to use it for through messages. If New South Wales and Queensland between them as a joint speculation choose to make an overland line to the Gulf of Carpentaria, without calling on the other colonies for aid, and look to them to indemnify them, there is no doubt but that they will command that traffic, and that a submarine line will not, at least for a long time, be laid down in competition with it. But of course if a joint action among all the colonies is desired, then that sort of line which is best adapted for through messages will be fixed upon, and the local considerations as to communication with inland territory will be disregarded, as being the concern exclusively of the colony to which that territory belongs.

THE "CRISIS."

WHAT, then, has been gained by the Ministerial crisis? What by the Ministry? What light has been thrown upon the opinions of the House or upon the state of parties? Have there been, after all, any clear indications of the probable support which the Ministry will receive in any of the great measures announced? Even upon the ostensible subject of discussion all is obscure and unsatisfactory. It is impossible to find a clue to order in this chaos of opinions.

If an outsider were to ask what is the conclusion of the Assembly upon the tea and sugar duties, all these divisions in any way disclose it? The majority made up in uncertain proportions of persons who are in favour of the duty—of persons who are against it—of those who desire to support the Ministry, and of those who wish only to try them—implies nothing conclusive. Considered in relation to the stability of Mr. COWPER'S Government, it has lost all its force by the explanations of hon. members.

Mr. COWPER interprets the vote as a vote of confidence. Mr. ROBERTSON considers it the reversion of an expression of distrust merely in matters of finance. Mr. JONES thinks Mr. COWPER would make a very great mistake if he considered it a vote of confidence. Dr. LANE and his followers interpret their vote as totally unconnected with the question of the duty, which they profess to condemn. Is it possible then, with such a medley of explanations, to interpret the division? The Ministers have left it quite in doubt whether they are disposed to abandon this tax altogether, or whether, if they do so, they are yielding to a pressure, or are following their own convictions. While they call upon the House to rescind the motion of Mr. PARKES, they are at the same time preparing to give it effect. They go to the Assembly without any set purpose on the subject; Mr. PARKES then unexpectedly carries his motion; that motion becomes the indication of a prevailing opinion upon which Ministers found their policy. At the same moment that they demand the vote shall be expunged from the proceedings of the House, they prepare to adopt it, and thus, after all, the repeal, if it be accomplished, will be attributable not to the spontaneous action of the Ministry, but to the desire of the Ministry to counter-march Mr. PARKES, or, using Mr. ROBERTSON'S expression, "to take the wind out of his sails."

The question arises, why did not the Ministers demand at this crisis an express vote of confidence—one that should entitle them to that degree of support to which men may lay their claim when there is nothing in their past measures to weaken it, and nothing in the character of their promised measures to destroy it. The COWPER Ministry, supposing the persons who compose it have the confidence of the House, or entitled to ask it, have at least done nothing since the assembling of Parliament to forfeit parliamentary support. Thus the obvious course would have been, if the vote of the House on the sugar duty justified the tender of their resignation, to have afforded every facility for the construction of another Government, or to have demanded a vote of confidence which should have given something like stability to their own.

Looking at all the explanations given, there are many who believe that another Government might have been formed, had its construction been fully and fairly tried. Mr. COWPER is perfectly aware that Mr. MURRAY is not the man who just now would be likely to command a majority of the Opposition. That gentleman was formerly his own colleague. He has since been rarely present in the House, and on some occasions he has abandoned motions in opposition to the Government, in-way but little satisfactory to those around him.

 We do not say that a parliamentary campaign well conducted would not entitle Mr. MURRAY to the confidence of a large body of the members:—his long parliamentary experience, his fluency as a debater, and his character as a gentleman, would probably attach to him considerable weight and influence; but no one knew more thoroughly than Mr. COWLEY, when he proposed that Mr. MURRAY should be sent for, that Mr. MURRAY would fail. We are by no means confident, with the present state of the opposition, that a good working Government could have been formed, and under such circumstances we should much prefer the continuance of the present Cabinet. If we are to have another Government it should be one that has a principle and a character to maintain—one that it will be worth while to rally round and support, and not an amalgamation of contradictions, which must be followed either by shameful compromises or early dissolution. Had Mr. COWPER, however, acted loyally to the principles of the Liberal Government, he would have ing messages will be fixed upon, and the local considerations as to communication with inland territory will be disregarded, as being the concern exclusively of the colony to which that territory belongs.

Such seems to us to be the principal points to be urged with respect to the relative merits of the two modes of establishing the communication, and according to the importance attached to these arguments in favour of either side will be the ultimate decision. To have both lines would, doubtless, be best, as one or other would probably be always in working order; but this, though it may come some day, will be too expensive a luxury at first, and, in choosing one to begin with, the point for consideration is, which is the best as a pioneer.

It will be seen by our insolvency report that Messrs. George A. Lloyd and Co. have sequestered their estate to-day. The cause assigned by affidavit is stated to be pressure of a creditor under execution. It appears that Messrs. Lloyd and Co., at a recent meeting of their creditors, arranged a composition which was passed without opposition at the time, and agreed to subsequently by all but three or four. One of those dissentients proceeding to sale, a sequestration was had recourse to for the protection of the general body.

The Lord Worsley arrived to-day from New Zealand, with 563 ounces of gold dust.

Business during the past month has been quiet, and the transactions that have taken place have not been to any extent. The principal fluctuations in our markets have occurred in flour, sugar, and tea, which have been sold and are firm at improved rates. A motion was passed in the Legislative Assembly recommending the abolition of the duties on tea and sugar. In consequence of this motion no duty has been paid on sugar during the last week—but as the Ministry have since succeeded in having the motion rescinded, it is not likely that the duties will be abolished, although it is expected that there will be a reduction proposed when the Colonial Treasurer makes his financial statement. The following is the latest report of the state of our markets:—
